Time at Opening: Oral health-related quality of life in Dutch adults: a comparison with the adult general population. To compare the self-rated oral health-related quality of life (OHRQoL) of a representative sample of the Dutch adult population with that of members of the general population. In July 2004, a total of 864 participants in the third health examination of the 'Rotterdam Study' were included. Participants were dichotomized into either good/moderate or poor/very poor OHRQoL (1 = either 'poor' or 'very poor', 2 = good/moderate). The outcome of the present study was obtained from answers to the OHIP-14. A logistic regression model was adjusted for all potential confounders (5 or more missing teeth, number of present teeth, body mass index, smoking status and level of education). The prevalence of having good/moderate OHRQoL was 7.4% in the adult study population, which is lower than in the general population (13.7%). Compared with good/moderate OHRQoL, having poor/very poor OHRQoL was associated with the following confounders: older age, being female, having 5 or more missing teeth, having a BMI  $\geq 30$ , being a daily smoker, and being highly educated. In the total sample, but not in participants aged between 45 and 65 years, having 5 or more missing teeth was significantly associated with having poor/very poor OHRQoL. The latter did not differ from those with no missing teeth in the 45- to 65-year-old group. In participants aged 45 to 65 years, being female, having 5 or more missing teeth, and having a BMI  $\geq 30$  were associated with having poor/very poor OHRQoL. The prevalence of having poor/very poor OHRQoL
